- (a) Take Disney. Its strategy is to create and commercialise “corporate franchises”¹ such as Frozen and The Avengers that strengthen the earnings power of each business in its broad portfolio of resort parks, movies, gaming, retail, theatre and more. Chief Executive Bob Iger can hold the individual businesses accountable for their own results and for strengthening the corporate franchises from which they all benefit. Moreover, with a strategy that brings real competitive advantages to its businesses, Disney has a more stable enterprise; those businesses have no better place to live than in the House of Disney.²

- (b) It [has] been [Angela Ahrendts'] job to keep the 158-year-old [Burberry] brand looking fresh, and she [has] done so not by abandoning the company's past successes in favour of the radically different. The company's iconic trench coat, for example, is more than a century old, yet remains the company's flagship product. How does Burberry keep customers coming back for more? Ahrendts explains: "The trench coat is ageless, timeless, seasonless. We don't use any of the traditional marketing metrics when we're looking at the trench coat. The goal is to make it the most artistic item of the season; the goal is to make it the most classic item. If the trench coat gets too narrow, then we haven't done our job. In our mind, everyone in the world should have a trench coat, and there should be a trench coat for everyone in the world. It doesn't matter your age; it doesn't matter you gender."

Elaborate on incremental innovation and how Burberry's trench coat is an example of incremental innovation.

- (a) If you [have] ever felt like your Facebook News Feed is filled with people you do [not] care about sharing thoughts you did [not] particularly want to hear, you [will] appreciate why Facebook is pushing to further the art of artificial intelligence [AI]. In its current form, the social network is still far better at collecting vast amounts of data than understanding what that data means. Advanced AI could help emphasise the stuff that [is] truly relevant to you, keeping you on the service longer and boosting your attractiveness as a subject for targeted advertising. Kevin Systrom, Facebook co-founder, says, *"Facebook is working to be at the centre of the world of AI because it will affect Instagram, WhatsApp, and Messenger. It's broadly applicable to all social products."*⁶

Justify how the Internet makes market segmentation easier for Facebook.

- (b) Facebook announced that global employees will receive four months of paid parental leave, in the latest in a series of signs that Silicon Valley's biggest companies are becoming more family-friendly. "We want to be there for our people at all stages of life, and in particular we strive to be a leading place to work for families," wrote Lori Matloff Goler, Facebook's Human Resources head, in a Facebook post. She said the updated policy affects primarily men and people in same-sex relationships across the world, and does not alter existing maternity leave practices. Just last week, Mark Zuckerberg announced that he will take two months of parental leave when his wife Priscilla Chan gives birth to their first child. In the post he cited the paternity leave time of four months for Facebook employees in the U.S., which has now been expanded to include all of the roughly 12,000 Facebook employees worldwide. Facebook is the latest in a growing list of tech companies updating their paternity leave policies, including Adobe, Apple, Microsoft, Netflix and Spotify. The updates to existing parental leave policies reflect a cultural shift within the tech industry, as many young employees in Silicon Valley reach the next stage of their lives.⁷

Demonstrate how Facebook is able to ensure a well-designed strategic management system by securing sufficient attention to its human resource dimension.
